

na
4921 Logan Avenue South
Minneapolis, Minnesota 55409
March 13, 1968

Joshua Lederberg
Department of Genetics
Stanford University School of Medicine
Palo Alto, California 94304

Dear Mr. Lederberg:

Thank you very much for your informative reply to my letter concerning parthenogenesis. After listening to professors of religion sound off as authorities on what science says cannot happen, it is refreshing to get the truly objective opinion of a man of science.

In regard to your question on whether or not Christ belonged to any of the conventional categories of humanity, I can only point out the fact that none of the prima facie evidence which we have (i.e. the gospels) ever give any whisper of a doubt that Christ was fully human in a biological sense; neither is there any indication that he was less than male, although the first-century witnesses did not have any of the sophisticated knowledge of sex differentiation that modern science has. Further, I do not know of any treatment of the question of Jesus' sex, perhaps because the question has not arisen in theological circles. If I ever find anything on the subject, however, I will make it available to you.

Once again, thank you for your reply.

Sincerely,

William L. Scurrah

William L. Scurrah

P.S. The only organization actively engaged in relating science to Christian dogma is the Creation Research Society, made up of a number of Ph.D.'s and M.S.'s. If you would like information on the organization, I can get the address of their secretary for you.